

Streptococcal Infections

Streptococcal infections are very common and difficult to correct. They are usually very chronic and even though they are not constantly symptomatic we find that they may always be present sub clinically.

Streptococcal infections such as strep throat are easy to manage with any number of procedures or medications but these procedures usually do not completely correct the infection but rather suppress it into a sub clinical condition.

This procedure will help the body gain full control of streptococcal infections so that they are no longer effecting any of your bodily systems, clinically or sub clinically. This will usually prevent this infection from returning and prevent any number of other immune related conditions.
