

TMJ Temporal Mandibular Joint

The Temporal Mandibular Joint or Jaw Joint is the most innervated joint of the body. It is also one of the most complex joints as far as function in the body. When damaged it is one the most difficult joints to correct and it can cause not only local joint pain but significant neurological dysfunctions as well. If a patient is suffering from any neurological disease it can also significantly complicate that disease.

There are many methods of damaging or injuring the jaw joint and some are complex and perpetual. The most obvious method of injury is direct physical trauma. These cases are usually the easiest to correct as the injury was sudden and the function of the joint is usually still intact. Whiplash is another significant method of injuring the TMJ. When struck from behind the jaw opens incorrectly and too quickly, damaging the ligaments of the TMJ. After any whiplash injury the TMJ must be closely evaluated and treated.

The most common and devastating method of damaging the TMJ is dental changes. Either poor dental work or lack of dental work can change the position and motion of the jaw. It can also alter the position of the jaw as you chew placing much more stress on the joint during function that it should have. All cases of TMJ should be treated with the following protocol and should also be evaluated by a dentist trained in TMJ therapy.
